The Bigness of New York

NO CITY is self-contained and independent. New York does not and cannot exist by itself alone. It is big—so big that it must depend upon the entire State. It lives and grows and becomes greater each day with the aid of the other communities in this State. It is dependent upon the produce and the products of these communities. Day after day their men and women must toil by thousands to enable the greatest city of the Western World to carry on. Their pastures, their farms, their forests, their factories and their mills must all give of their output to the Metropolis, or else millions of people within the city must suffer.

ALL roads lead to the modern Rome. They not only lead to it, but they lead out from it to the centers of trade and industry and agriculture upon which this city depends. These roads are its highways, rivers, canals, railroads, telegraph and telephone wires. They reach the large communities and the small communities.

And of these none is greater than the telephone.

Its service is quick, direct and personal.

It keeps New York in touch with its sources of supplies.

Daily and hourly it carries the orders and directs and watches the transportation and conduct of business, big and little, with a speed and sureness that saves New York millions of dollars.

It is invaluable.

The New York of today could no more do without the service of the State-wide telephone system than it could do without transportation. The city and the State are so closely related and their interests so finely interwoven that it is not possible to separate them.

This State-wide system of telephone communication must:

- Serve all communities in the State.
- Bring them all together into one neighborhood.
- Give everyone adequate service at reasonable cost.

To do their part to keep this system adequate the communities of the State outside the City are paying higher rates. Now the City itself, the one community that benefits most, is asked to do its part to maintain and develop this great system—this highway that has done so much to make New York big.

Not only must it be maintained. It must be expanded. New markets, new industrial plants, new activities of all kinds are constantly springing up in out of the way corners. Before the wheels have begun to turn the telephone must be there ready to serve them and you—ready to make them a smoothly functioning part of the great industrial fabric that is New York.

L'Exposition Universelle PRESENTS

AN EARLY OPENING In the Women's Fashion Salons

Featuring

The WARDROBE of the AUTUMN BRIDE

The early Autumn mode, in its every newness of line and detail, its wealth of exquisite material, its beauty of ornament and loveliness of color, is presented in the Fashion Salons tomorrow. A complete collection of gowns, wraps, suits and blouses designed to interest every woman who is buying her autumn wardrobe will be shown.

The Autumn Bride

And because we have always thought the autumn bride to be neglected, a special exhibition of frocks, suits, wraps and gowns has been arranged for her. This collection of lovely things—of interest to every woman, whether she be a bride or not—includes an exquisite wedding gown, wonderful in its fragile lace and flower like charm, two brides' maids' frocks, besides reception gowns and cloth going-away frocks.

Frocks for the afternoon.

For the bride's—or any smart woman's—wardrobe, is a collection of new afternoon frocks that are a true revelation of how lovely the season's mode is, and to what ingenious lengths the designers have gone to gain new and beautiful detail of trimming.

Gowns of lovely supple satin in black, with the finest of beaded motifs and embroidery that Paris now insists upon; these for afternoon and dinner wear.

Gowns for the evening.

Evening gowns massed with fine beads in shimmering loveliness, lovely in line, perfect in detail. Evening gowns of black lace and fine spun beads, or in the more conservative modes of black lace and black satin.

The new color notes struck by Paris this season appear again and again in the small details of trimming, marking the gowns as distinctly of this season.

Cloth frocks in serge and tricotine, are simple in line, but beautifully embroidered with silk or metal, or beaded or touched with the brightness of finely cut steel. Nowhere is the mode reflected more smartly than by these.

Luxurious Wraps

Wraps for general wear for the motor in town, for afternoon wear, and for the opera are deeply fur trimmed and of superb materials.

The novel use of two tones of material, exquisitely joined, will be shown. New colors: bay leaf green, Malay and Zanzibar brown, moonstone gray, and pine needle green, in marvella cloth and fortuna cloth. Huge collars of fine Scotch mole, of Hudson seal, of squirrel and of wolf and skunk give these new things their warmth and charm.

Evening wraps of soft velvet, beaded and embroidered, deeply furled or touched with a piquant fringe of monkey fur are in vivid and dark colors.

Wraps that show the new possibilities of embroidery in silk and in metal are conspicuous in this collection. Not only the great enveloping wraps, but the wraps that show a slight—and very new—tendency to a bodice are included.

Trotteurs and elaborate Suits

If the bride prefers a slim tailored suit to a going away frock and wrap, there is a large selection from which she may choose her type. The finest of materials with alluring sheen and soft depths are used. The slightly longer coat, the new slimmness and severity of tailoring are shown as well as a three-piece suit that has its foundation on a straight-line frock.

Black and white effects, fur trimmed with deep skunk and lynx-dyed wolf, warm browns, beaded all over in the new fashion and collared and cuffed with mole. Suits trimmed with embroidery applied by artist hands and made exquisite by perfection of minute detail.

Autumn Suit Blouses

This season there seems to be a decided flair for suit blouses in the colors matching one's tailleur and in black. It is even perfectly correct to wear two dark harmonizing colors, such as soft warm brown or rose with a bottle green suit. This is a mode becoming to a great many women.

The autumn bride will find a surprisingly large collection from which to choose.

Chiffon and Georgette crepe blouses are exquisitely beaded by hand with fine beads in contrasting color and in delicate motifs. The Blouse Shop has these in charming variations of the tie-around mode. Some are slip-over models and have soft wide girdles of self material that tie behind or tie at the side.

A blouse of this sort gives the effect of an entire frock in excellent taste. A few of the new notes in the shop are:

A blue blouse embroidered with rose colored wool in a delicate design that looks as if it had been taken from a Persian jar. Another is midnight blue embroidered with Indian motif in rose and blue.

Chenille embroidery combined with fine metal thread is to be had in several dark blouses.

Real fillet lace, ecru tinted and combined with ecru Georgette crepe, fashions a becoming collar and vestee in many dark blouses.

Prices for these, the finer types of suit blouses, range from $22.50 to $125.

English Suits

The Women's English Shop has newly received a collection of REDLEAF London tailored top-coats and suits for autumn travel, sports and general wear. These are lovelier than any we have ever had for several seasons; the colors are unusually fine, soft beige, mauve, rose, warm browns, and heathery combinations characteristic of Scotch home-spuns and tweeds.

The models are all absolutely and correctly cut according to English lines. Some of them made with four swagger patch pockets with inverted pleats and woven leather button fastenings. They all have that wonderful peat cured quality that only the genuine old country tweeds and home-spuns have.

This type of suit is particularly correct and attractive for mountain wear and for cross-country walking and other autumn country wear.

$75, $85 and up to $125.

Topcoats in the same materials made with raglan or set-in sleeves with notch or adjustable collars and feature great patch pockets, smart and convenient, are $75, $85, $97.50.
